Violence against children is not an isolated occurrence, it is everywhere: in every country, community and social group. It may take different forms: physical, psychological, sexual abuse, exploitation, neglect or mistreatment, verbal violence, bullying, or cyber-bullying. Violence is a problem of public health, a violation of human rights with potentially devastating and costly consequences.

There is incontrovertible evidence of the harm of violence to the physical and mental health and development of children, to their ability to learn and build relationships with other people,

Although school violence has become a major challenge, it is not the education system in itself that causes it. It merely reflects the prevailing social norms, making them visible to everyone. At the same time, the education system makes it possible to address school violence, but only in partnership among all stakeholders: the school, the children, the parents, and the entire community.

Violence in schools

School violence has been on the rise in recent years, and it has devastating and costly consequences on society. So, what are the measures that may be taken to prevent it?

First, we should create a safe, supportive school climate. For instance provide psychological counselling services and caring school climate programs. In the same vein, we had better build positive interpersonal relationships through encouraging students to take responsibility for their part in maintaining safe school environments, including student participation in safety planning. Furthermore, we must implement a system of awarding rewards for good actions and behaviours that gives a feeling of challenge and competition among students who perform good activities.

In conclusion, many people see school violence as minor, but it is a big deal that requires the cooperation of the entire community.
